Trump's Foray Into Crypto Market Irks the Industry

FROM FIRST BUSINESS PAGE

The surprise disclosure raised fresh ethics and legal concerns about the ways in which Mr. Trump continues to cash in on his power and fame, in this case by marketing a digital asset in an inherently volatile and speculative market to millions of his followers.

And it set off a wave of criticism from inside the industry that he says he wants to champion.

Crypto executives criticized the move as a cash grab, saying that Mr. Trump had undercut the industry's credibility at the very moment when proponents were seeking a more prominent place for digital currencies in mainstream finance and business.

His venture, they said, created a brief and highly publicized bubble that partly deflated within a few days even as Mr. Trump's family and its business partners collected millions of dollars from fees on purchases and sales of the coin.

"It makes it all look corrupt and self-interested," said Nic Carter, a vocal supporter of Mr. Trump who runs the crypto investment firm Castle Island Ventures and was at the Crypto Ball as the new $Trump coin was announced.

An analysis by the crypto forensics company Chainalysis showed that the majority of people who bought $Trump were likely inexperienced retail investors, possibly dabbling in crypto for the first time. These traders "roughly broke even," the analysis said, though more than 100,000 of them lost money.

Yet by one estimate, the launch of $Trump generated $58 million in fees for the Trump family in less than a day. As of Friday night, the family also owns, at least on paper, $23 billion worth of $Trump at its $29 price — already a 60 percent drop from the peak. That price would crash even further if the family did a so-called rug pull and moved to rapidly sell off its holdings.

Asked last week at the White House about the coin's launch, Mr. Trump said, "I don't know much about it."

But even after the inauguration, he continued to repost the celebratory announcement of the $Trump token — effectively urging more people to buy the coin after its price collapsed.

Ryan Selkis, a crypto entrepreneur who was one of the president's earliest supporters in the industry, said on social media that the memecoin episode would cost the Trump administration "a lot of $ and goodwill."

"Trump needs to fire his crypto advisors, from top to bottom and replace with people who know what they are doing," another crypto executive, Gabor Gurbacs, wrote on X after the coin's price plummeted.

The memecoin launch was the first time the Trump family had issued a digital currency that any investor could buy or sell on crypto exchanges. But the plan, one Trump Organization executive said, grew out of an earlier effort organized in part by Bill Zanker, a serial entrepreneur and friend of Mr. Trump's who has previously sold back rubs, gym equipment and self-help courses.

Mr. Zanker and the Trump family began selling $99 digital trading cards in 2022 depicting Mr. Trump as a superhero in a crypto-based format known as a nonfungible token, or NFT.

But NFTs, at least in theory, serve as digital artwork or collectibles, whereas the Trump token was treated by buyers more like GameStop shares, the so-called meme stock that many amateur traders bought in recent years in hopes of earning a quick profit.

A onetime crypto skeptic, Mr. Trump embraced the industry on the campaign trail last year, promising to end the Biden administration's regulatory crackdown on crypto firms.

"We're going to make a lot of money for the country," Mr. Trump said last Thursday as he signed an executive order at the White House pledging to promote the crypto industry.

It's a business in which Mr. Trump has a substantial personal stake. In September, he and his sons helped start World Liberty Financial, a company designed to facilitate borrowing and lending in digital currencies.

And since his election victory, Mr. Trump has made a series of personnel selections at regulatory agencies that seem poised to help the industry.

In an interview on Friday, Eric Trump, the president's middle son, dismissed criticism of the decision to release the $Trump tokens and questions about whether it was a conflict of interest for the Trump family to be introducing its own digital currency while President Trump is appointing financial regulators.

"The $Trump trading card and World Liberty Financial are two of the most successful projects in crypto history," he said.

The Crypto Ball was promoted as a celebration of the industry's political success — the sort of party that crypto enthusiasts usually throw on yachts and beaches, just transplanted to an auditorium a 15-minute walk from the White House.

It was also an opportunity for top crypto executives to network with some of the most influential figures in Washington. Fred Thiel, the chief executive of the Bitcoin mining firm Mara Holdings, chatted with House Speaker Mike Johnson, who sent a text to President Trump right in front of him. "Everyone was very pumped," Mr. Thiel said in an interview.

But it turned out the most important action in the crypto market was happening on social media. "Trump Meme is HERE!" Mr. Trump wrote on Truth Social and X as Snoop Dogg took the stage. "It's time to celebrate everything we stand for: WINNING!"

Proponents of digital currencies say they can grow into a widely used means of exchange, allowing instant transfers of wealth efficiently and privately, outside the traditional banking system. Memecoins, a type of digital currency based on a joke or a celebrity mascot, are controversial in the crypto world. They have no practical utility and are often deployed in pump-and-dump schemes or other scams.

But traders with good instincts can generate quick profits — if they buy quickly as the price is rising and then sell their holdings before earlier buyers cash out.

Josh Bailey, a crypto trader in Austin, Texas, saw Mr. Trump's announcement almost immediately after it was posted. At first, he wasn't sure if it was real. "The president of the United States launching a memecoin," Mr. Bailey said. "I was not expecting that."

Soon the coin's price was surging. Within a few hours, the total value of all the $Trump in circulation was over $5 billion. Mr. Bailey decided to put in $12,000. By the time he cashed out, his trove had more than quintupled in value.

By Sunday morning, less than two days later, Mr. Trump's coin was among the most valuable cryptocurrencies in the world, and his partnership's holdings were worth more than $50 billion on paper. A business entity controlled by Trump Organization and its partners owned 80 percent of the coins and collected fees as the coins were traded.

Some saw gimmicks that hurt digital currency's credibility.

Eric Trump, in a social media post, hailed the new investment as "the hottest digital meme on earth."

Already, though, Mr. Trump's crypto supporters were growing frustrated. Many of the people who attended the Crypto Ball were effectively cut out of the moneymaking opportunity, unable to buy the coin early enough to profit because they were out partying rather than online.

"I'm legitimately heated about it," Mr. Carter said. "Why wouldn't they just do an announcement over the speakers?"

Then, on that Sunday afternoon, a post appeared on Melania Trump's X account: She was launching a memecoin of her own, essentially creating a competitor in the market. The price of $Trump plummeted by 60 percent over the next day.

Suddenly, the industry's enthusiasm for Mr. Trump turned to fury.

Justin Bons, a crypto executive, said the back-to-back memecoin announcements were "nothing more than blatant money grabs." Another trader said he was "missing Gary Gensler right now," a reference to the former Securities and Exchange Commission chair who filed numerous lawsuits against crypto companies.

The new Trump token also quickly generated legal questions, centering on whether it constituted a security and should have been subject to federal disclosure and registration requirements.

The $Melania tokens "are digital collectibles," the family said as it announced the offering, "not intended to be, or to be the subject of, an investment opportunity." But trading patterns show that this was not how buyers treated these tokens — buying and selling them in most cases in an effort to make money.

During the Biden administration, the S.E.C. under Mr. Gensler adopted an aggressive posture toward cryptocurrencies, arguing that the vast majority of them were securities that should be closely regulated.

In 2023, the S.E.C. accused the backers of a cartoon NFT series called Stoner Cats of selling an unregistered security after the images were marketed in a way that "led investors reasonably to expect to profit from the managerial and entrepreneurial efforts of" the backers.

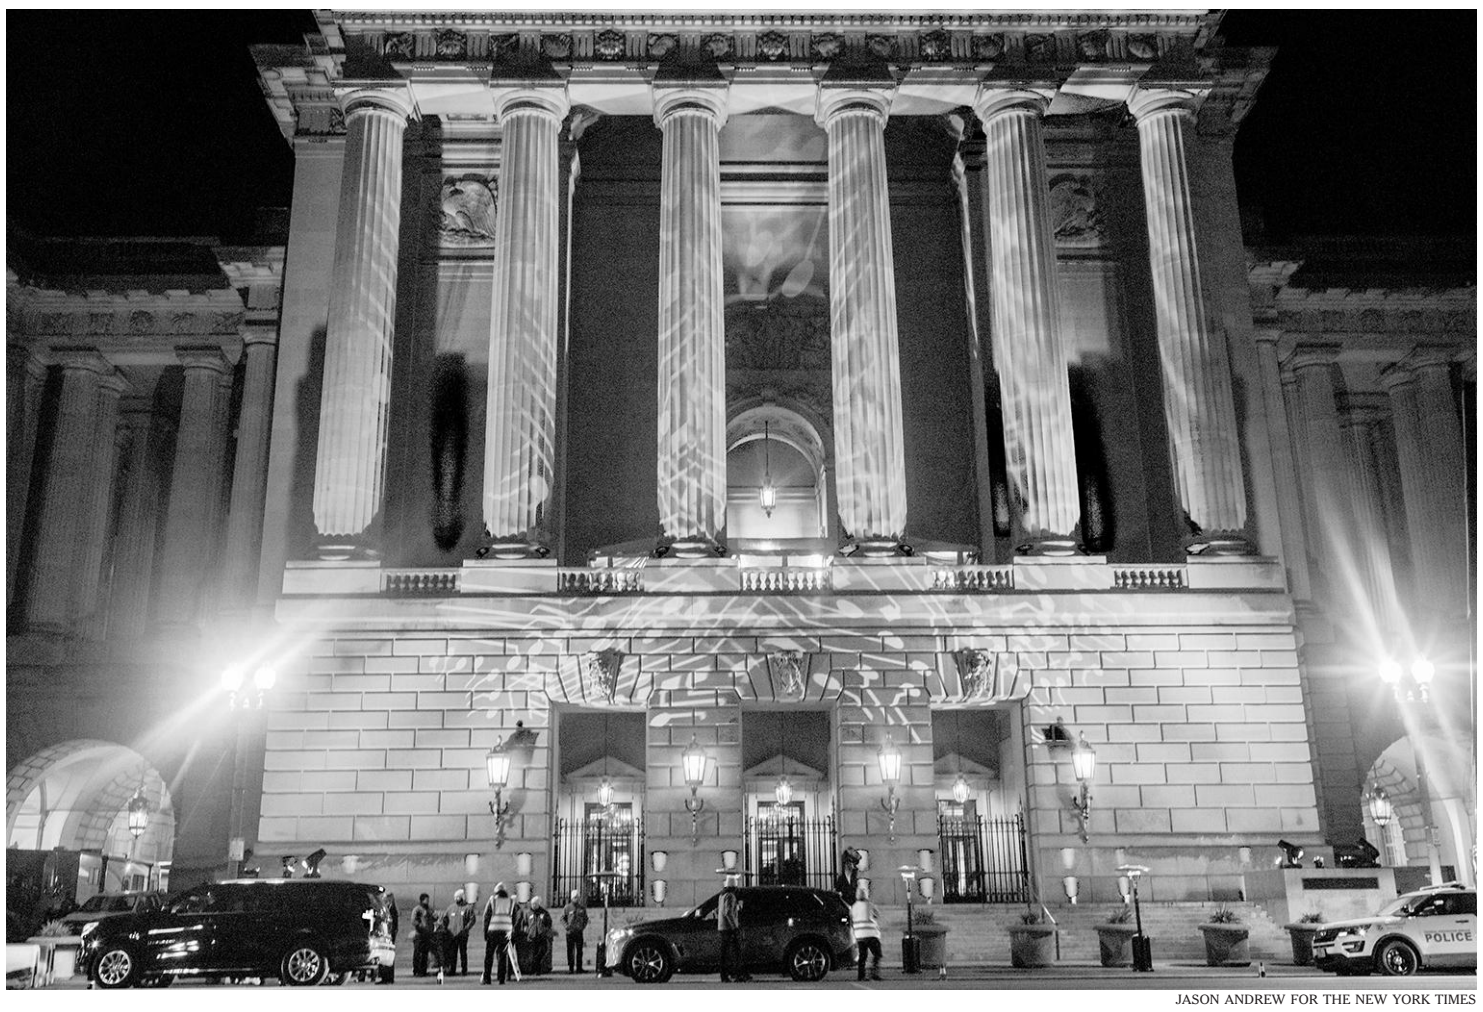

Allison Herren Lee, a former S.E.C. commissioner, said that during her tenure the new Trump-family coins would certainly have generated a staff review to evaluate if they complied with the law.

"That analysis does not turn on whether the promoters call it a security," she said. "It turns on whether it's marketed as an investment, meaning generally that purchasers will get a return based on the efforts of others."

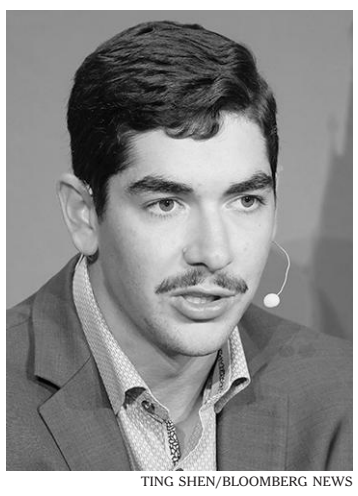

Democrats in Congress, including Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, have already written a letter to federal regulators asking them to investigate the matter.

But opening such an inquiry now would effectively require the S.E.C. to investigate the family of a president who just nominated the agency's chairman — an experienced securities lawyer with close ties to the crypto industry.

It is already clear that some of the buyers of the $Trump token jumped too slowly and ended up losing money. An investor using the pseudonym Ansem spent $9 million in cryptocurrency to buy $Trump just before it fell in value, and then sold the holdings two hours later at a roughly $2 million loss, according to public records first identified by an account called Lookonchain.

Doug Emhoff Shifts Back To Career As Attorney

By LAUREN HIRSCH

The latest guessing game in Washington is where former Vice President Kamala Harris and her husband, Doug Emhoff, might go next. Half of that question has been answered.

Starting Monday, Mr. Emhoff became a partner at the corporate law firm Willkie Farr & Gallagher, splitting his time between Los Angeles and New York. He will advise companies on crises including litigation and corporate investigations.

Mr. Emhoff spent decades as a corporate lawyer before moving to Washington. He was a cofounder of a boutique law firm in 2000, which he sold to a rival, Venable, in 2006. He left Venable in 2017 for DLA Piper and stepped away full time in 2020, partly to avoid questions of conflicts of interest once his wife became vice president.

His clients have included Spotify and Lionsgate. He has also represented Willie Gault, the former Olympic sprinter and N.F.L. star, in a fraud case brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission; and Mauricio Umansky, the husband of Kyle Richards, a star of "The Real Housewives of Beverly Hills," in a real estate dispute.

As a law firm partner, the former second gentleman will advise companies in crisis.

Willkie, which employs more than 1,200 lawyers globally, will tap Mr. Emhoff's experience from his legal career and as second gentleman in the White House. Through that work, he has amassed a network of prominent figures in entertainment, private equity and the corporate world.

Mr. Emhoff was a visible presence during the presidential campaign, helping his wife raise more than $1 billion. He also represented the United States in a diplomatic capacity at events like the 2024 Summer Olympics in Paris, and led the Biden administration's efforts to combat antisemitism.

"That got him in touch with very important leaders across the globe," said Thomas M. Cerabino, a co-chairman at Willkie. "We think that Doug, as a trusted adviser as well as a lawyer, is going to create opportunities that will be an incredible boost across all fronts."

Leagues, athletes risk their reputations by staying on X

Nancy Armour
Columnist
USA TODAY

The 'X' logo is seen on the top of the headquarters of the social media platform X in downtown San Francisco on July 30, 2023. CARLOS BARRIA/REUTERS

Gabby Thomas is as smart as she is fast, a three-time Olympic champion sprinter who graduated from Harvard and then went on to get a master's in epidemiology. Yet over the weekend, racist trolls flooded her X page with nasty comments belittling her intelligence and achievements.

This is what X has become: a toxic cesspool whose owner embraces, encourages and amplifies the very worst of humanity.

And it ought to be a blaring warning to the NFL, NBA, college athletics and all the other folks in the sports world who are ignoring the alternative to it.

Ordinarily hyper-sensitive to their images and petrified of anything that could threaten them, most teams, leagues and athletes are blithely continuing to use X despite the looming PR nightmare. They don't seem to realize that as Elon Musk does more and more awful things, and X degrades further and further, it's their follow counts and reputations that will take the hit.

I doubt the NBA wants porn ads adjacent to its account. Or members of the Proud Boys liking its highlight videos.

I can only imagine the heartburn NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell felt when he saw Musk make Nazi jokes on the same platform where the league has its largest social media presence and then, two days before Holocaust Remembrance Day, suggest the German people should just "move beyond" their "past guilt" over the atrocities of World War II.

But this is what they are choosing. And given the skyrocketing number of people who are opting for Bluesky, it is most definitely a choice.

Bluesky is an outgrowth of a research initiative at what was then Twitter. But while algorithms drive what you see on X, and Musk can goose it in any way he likes to promote bad stuff, Bluesky functions at the whim of the user. You choose what you want to see and whom you want to follow. If a troll is harassing you, you can block their posts so no one sees them. You also can detach comments, eliminating their reach.

Bluesky defangs trolls. Musk feeds, waters and walks them twice a day.

"The value of Bluesky to athletes is that, because it's moderated, players can engage and talk to their fans, without being overwhelmed by idiots," Mark Cuban, the former owner of the Dallas Mavericks who has become a Bluesky enthusiast, said in an email.

"Bluesky with moderation allows leagues, brands, players, celebs to engage with fans," Cuban wrote. "I see it every day. The quality ratio is about 90 pct on Bluesky vs about 50 pct or less on X."

Yet the NWSL is the only one of the major professional sports leagues to be actively using Bluesky. According to Sportico, the NFL and NBA only operate on platforms where they have agreements, which often include financial incentives, and they do not have ones with Bluesky. The WNBA and NBA at least allow their teams to have Bluesky accounts; the NFL does not.

It's hard to abandon social media sites where you've built up significant followings, as the leagues, their broadcasters and many athletes have on X. The NBA has almost 48 million followers on X; the NFL has 37 million. LeBron James has almost 53 million followers on X; Patrick Mahomes has 2.6 million.

It's also hard to abandon it when X continues to be where people make news.

(Full disclosure: I still have an X account solely for that reason, using the alert function so I can see what people I cover post.)

But as more people move to Bluesky, including sports influencers like Pat McAfee, Mina Kimes, Ian Rapoport and Monica McNutt, there's an opening for the leagues to replicate that fan base.

Bluesky reached 20 million users in mid-November, tripling its user base in just three months. It was nearing 30 million by Monday afternoon.

"I think the only missing pieces for Bluesky are real-time news and scores, which is rapidly being added, and a few verticals," Cuban said. "I think that changes over time."

The beauty of Twitter was as a second-screen community, allowing fans to interact, get additional information and, eventually, get replays. It was like watching the game from a broadcast control room with all of your closest friends.

That was missing from Bluesky initially, but it's gaining steam.

When the refs robbed the Buffalo Bills of a first down on Josh Allen's QB sneak early in the fourth quarter, the reaction on Bluesky was reminiscent of Twitter in the old days.

"As it grows, it will only be increasingly valuable," Cuban said. "The social media space has bifurcated into unmoderated vs. moderated. It sure looks like most people prefer moderation and a less hateful site."

And as Musk and X increasingly lean into their worst tendencies, that will only pick up pace.

The Guardian and Le Monde, France's paper of record, have already stopped posting on X.

After Musk's hand gesture that sure looked like a Nazi salute at last week's inauguration, moderators of the NFL, NBA, Formula 1 and soccer communities on Reddit banned links to X.

"We have reached this decision after taking recent events and strong sentiment from our community into account," the /r/NBA moderators said in a post. "While we try our best to stay neutral and apolitical, we do not believe taking a stance against Nazi symbolism is or should be a political issue. Hate speech and the promotion of it has never been tolerated in our community."

Social media is supposed to be fun and informative, a way to reach people you otherwise wouldn't.

When it becomes a haven for white supremacists, neo-Nazis and others who don't value democracy or diversity, it's time to leave.

Shiffrin returns to ski circuit after crash

Nancy Armour
USA TODAY

Mikaela Shiffrin is all healed up and ready to go.

Shiffrin will return to the World Cup Alpine skiing circuit Thursday in Courchevel, France, nine weeks after suffering a puncture wound and tearing in her abdominal muscles in a crash during a giant slalom race in Killington, Vermont. Her next victory will be the 100th of her career, and she's won seven times at Courchevel.

Shiffrin posted a video of herself in the gym and back on snow on her social media accounts last Thursday. The last frame had "Courchevel 1/30 … See you soon."

After winning twice in her first three races this season, the expectation was that Shiffrin would get her 100th victory in Killington, one of her favorite venues and a two-hour drive from the Burke Mountain Academy that she attended as a teenager. All was going according to plan after the first run in the giant slalom, where she took a comfortable lead over Sara Hector of Sweden.

But less than 15 seconds from the finish line of the second run, Shiffrin lost an edge. She slammed into one gate and somersaulted into another before coming to a stop in the safety netting. She spent about 20 minutes on the hill before being taken down on a sled.

"As far as the muscle trauma goes, there's a puncture and then basically whatever stabbed in there did a little dancey dance inside of my obliques and basically tore a cavern into my oblique muscles. That's what's causing bleeding and inflammation and just pain, in general," Shiffrin said in a Dec. 4 update.

Shiffrin also said there was some concern she'd damaged her colon because the puncture occurred close to it and there were some air bubbles. But an examination after she returned home to Colorado showed it was fine.

Shiffrin said at the time of the crash it would be "several weeks" before she'd be back to racing. She missed the slalom in Killington the day after the crash, as well as the World Cup stop at Beaver Creek on Dec. 14-15.

She has missed six slalom and giant slalom World Cup races since the beginning of the year. Shiffrin is currently 18th in the overall standings, making it unlikely she can win that title again this season. She's ninth in the slalom standings.
